THE SHORT VERSION

Three places where premium patients may hesitate

Bella Med Spa has a calm, professional website with a prominent booking action and genuine patient proof. This is not a case for rebuilding everything. The clearest opportunity is to remove three moments of uncertainty between a first visit and a confident booking.

WHAT IS ALREADY WORKING

A strong foundation is already in place

The homepage is polished, mobile-friendly and asks visitors to book rather than merely browse. Eight named patient reviews provide genuine proof. The opportunity is to move the best existing information closer to the booking decision.

EVIDENCE REVIEWED

The first patient impression

Desktop first screen reviewed at 1366 x 768.

Mobile first screen reviewed at 390 x 844.

THE THREE PRIORITY LEAKS

Where confidence can escape before booking

01 POSITIONING

The strongest selling message is visually hidden

WHAT WE OBSERVED

The largest headline reads "Bella Med Spa & Aesthetics". The more persuasive line - "advanced cosmetic treatments delivered with medical precision in a welcoming, boutique environment" - appears beneath it in smaller type.

WHY IT MATTERS

A visitor who clicked the practice name already knows who they reached. The first screen delays the answer to the more important question: why choose Bella?

THE OPPORTUNITY

Promote the patient-focused positioning line to the headline and let the logo carry the practice name.

02

AUTHORITY

Medical precision needs visible human proof

WHAT WE OBSERVED

The homepage promises treatments delivered with "medical precision", but the first booking screen does not identify the treating practitioner or show a relevant qualification beside that promise.

WHY IT MATTERS

For higher-value treatments, patients often want to know who will treat them before they are ready to commit.

THE OPPORTUNITY

Introduce the practitioner, appropriate credentials and a real photograph close to the primary booking action.

03

TRUST AND LOCATION

Reassurance appears after the decision point

WHAT WE OBSERVED

Eight patient reviews are published lower on the homepage, while neither Dallas nor McKinney is identified beside the first booking action.

WHY IT MATTERS

The visitor must move beyond the booking decision to find reassurance and must hunt to confirm whether the practice is near them.

THE OPPORTUNITY

Place one short review, the review count and both locations directly beneath the hero booking action.

Also noticed: The booking journey moves to a third-party platform. Where possible, preserve Bella's branding and location context throughout that handoff.

THE OPPORTUNITY

What the repaired journey feels like

A premium patient arrives and immediately understands why the practice is different. She sees who will treat her, confirms the right location, finds reassurance from another patient and moves into booking without losing confidence or context. The website feels as considered as the care she expects to receive.
